Lincoln on abolition in England and the United States

Introduction

Though Lincoln spoke frequently during the 1858 Illinois Senate race against Stephen Douglas—a campaign that propelled Lincoln to the political forefront and helped shape him into a presidential candidate—very few Lincoln manuscripts survive from this period.

In this undated speech fragment believed to be from that race, Lincoln stated his opposition to slavery as an inhumane practice while acknowledging the nation’s economic dependence to the institution. He also compared the ongoing struggle to end slavery in the United States to the successful abolition movement in Great Britain. He noted that Parliament had debated for nearly one hundred years over the same issues that American abolitionists now faced, and he praised the efforts of English abolitionists: “School-boys know that Wilbe[r]force... helped the [abolitionist] cause forward; but who can now name a single man who labored to retard it?”

It’s clear from this speech that Lincoln felt the abolition of slavery would be a slow process and that he might not live to see its end in his lifetime. Considering this, he still proclaimed his unwavering belief that its end must come. Lincoln expressed pride at his then modest involvement in fighting slavery; he did not yet know that he would be the driving force behind slavery’s ultimate extinction: “I am proud, in my passing speck of time, to contribute an humble mite to that glorious consummation, which my own poor eyes may not last to see.”

Questions for Discussion

Read the document introduction, view the image, and read the transcript. Then apply your knowledge of American history in order to answer the questions that follow.

1. Why did Lincoln mention two Englishmen, Granville Sharpe and William Wilberforce, in his speech about American slavery?
2. Compare this speech fragment from July 1858 with any of Lincoln’s comments made regarding slavery in the late 1840s or early 1850s. Note changes in his thinking.
3. Lincoln mentions those who were opposed to the elimination of slavery in England. Who would have been the equivalent “inferior race opponents,” “religion and good order opponents,” and “dollar and cents opponents” in the United States?
I have never professed an indifference to the honor of official station; and were I to do so now I should only make myself ridiculous. Yet I have never failed—do not now fail—to remember that in the republican cause there is a higher aim than that of men of office— I have not allowed myself to forget that the abolition of the slave trade in Great Britain was agitation a hundred years before it was a final success that the measure had its open firm set opponents; its stealthy “don’t care” opponents; its dollar and cent opponents; its inferior race opponents; its inferior equality opponents; and its religion and good order opponents; that all these opponents got office and their adversaries got none; but I have also remember that they burned like tallow candles for a century, at least they flickered in the public view, started in the dark for a brief season, and were remembered no more ever— the process. Schoolboys knew that well before, and Granville Sharp began that cause forever; but who can now name a single man who labors to return it? Remembering this thing I can not but regard it as possible that the higher object of this contest may not be completely attained within the term of my life. But I cannot doubt either that it will come in due time. Even in this view, I am proud, in my passing speck of time, to contribute an humble mite to that glorious consummation which my own poor eyes may not see.

Abraham Lincoln, speech fragment concerning the abolition of slavery, ca. July 1858. (Gilder Lehrman Collection, GLC05302)
Transcript

Abraham Lincoln, speech fragment concerning the abolition of slavery, ca. July 1858. (Gilder Lehrman Collection, GLC05302)

I have never professed an indifference to the honors of official station; and were I to do so now, I should only make myself ridiculous. Yet I have never failed – do not now fail – to remember that in the republican cause there is a higher aim than that of mere office – I have not allowed myself to forget that the abolition of the Slave-trade by Great Brittain [sic], was agitated a hundred years before it was a final success; that the measure had it’s open fire-eating opponents; it’s stealthy “don’t care” opponents; it’s dollars and cent opponents; it’s inferior race opponents; it’s negro equality opponents; and it’s religion and good order opponents; that all these opponents got offices, and their adversaries got none – But I have also remembered that [inserted: though] they blazed, like tallow-candles for a century, at last they flickered in the socket, died out, stank in the dark for a brief season, and were remembered no more, even by the smell – School-boys know that Wilberforce, and Granville Sharpe, helped that cause forward; but who can now name a single man who labored to retard it? Remembering these things I can not but regard it as possible that the higher object of this contest may not be completely attained within [2] the term of my [inserted: natural] life. But I can not doubt either that it will come in due time. Even in this view, I am proud, in my passing speck of time, to contribute an humble mite to that glorious consummation, which my own poor eyes may [struck: never] [inserted: not] last to see –